

Sam Peacock

Constraints Essay

When creating a personal portfolio website, multiple constraints need to be thought about, which can shape the final design. The most significant of these constraints is professional impact, as the website's entire purpose is to create possible career opportunities and to shed a positive light on my public reputation. This contract raises the standards for the websites, design, content, and functionality, as it is a direct showcase of my skills. Meaning a polished, well-rounded user experience is a must.

Economic factors are also another constraint that must be kept in mind. As this is a personal project, the budget is essentially zero, meaning I must use free hosting platforms for the website, as well as free development tools or assets. The only thing I plan on purchasing is a domain name. Finally, legal considerations are another constraint that must be thought about. All content needs to be original, made by me, or licensed under free use to prevent any property disputes. I also need to take into consideration any previously signed NDA's when talking about previous work I have done for past co-ops. Some information must be written in a way that I can show the skills I learned, without disclosing too much information about the projects themselves. These constraints will help ensure my final project is built with professionalism in mind, is cost-effective, and follows legal procedures.